

Feb. 1, 1945

I came to Woodbine looking for an opportunity to do work that was more useful than that in camp. The colony here had been very well spoken of, and some thought too well spoken of. I found though that it was better than I expected. The work is not hard, but it is at times disagreeable. Considering the mental age of the inmates, it is remarkable what can be done and what there is to be done with them.

As for conditions, the quarters are palatial compared to camp, the food is excellent and public relations are good, with prospects that they will get better instead of worse.

David Byler